Mr. Acland then addressed the meeting at considerahle length. After acknowledging the greetings with which the delegation had heen received, he said: Their appearance in the garh in which they presented themselves (the Oxford gown), and the ceremony with which they commenced this first examination, showed that it was not regarded hy them as an affair of to-day, hut as a great national proceeding, which was not to terminate with their individual action. The history of the progress of the hnman mind in England was associated very closely with the history of the universities; and if they went hack to the origin of the universities, they would find certain great practical influences always going side hy side with the training in learning therein ohtained....
